Reflection

- Description: I participated in a two-week international project with students from different countries and profiles. Daily meetings were held at school, and we were expected to work on a project using the Design Thinking process to address an issue at the TQ4 building.

- Feelings: Initially, I experienced confusion and a lack of direction due to communication problems and a struggle for leadership within the team. This constant chaos made me feel like the group was falling behind.

- Evaluation: The communication challenges and the desire for leadership from multiple team members created a chaotic and disorganized environment. This hindered progress and caused confusion among team members.

- Analysis: I realized that the main issue was not the diverse team composition or communication itself but the absence of a clear concept and plan. Without a defined direction and roles within the team, it became difficult to make progress and maintain a cohesive approach.

- Conclusion: Reflecting on the experience, you learned the importance of establishing clear roles and responsibilities within the team and creating a solid project plan based on a shared concept. Without these elements, effective communication becomes challenging, leading to confusion and a sense of being behind.

- Action Plan: In future projects, you would take proactive steps to address these challenges. Firstly, I would sit down with the team to agree upon team roles, ensuring clarity and reducing the desire for multiple leaders. Next, you would focus on creating a comprehensive project plan based on a well-defined concept. This plan would serve as a roadmap for the team, helping to guide their efforts and maintain a clear direction throughout the project.
